Apple and Google say they're doing their best to keep malicious apps out of their stores, but some still find their way in.

Generally speaking, those research reports quickly grab the attention of Apple and Google, who more often than not immediately remove the offending apps from their stores and take action against the developers behind them. But researchers warn that an app doesn't have to be obviously malicious, or even violate Apple or Google's rules for developers, to cause problems for users.

Audit your apps. This can also be good for keeping your monthly spending in check. The settings in both Apple and Android phones will show you what apps you're subscribed to and how much you're paying for them. Sometimes it's easy to forget that you're still paying for apps that you just don't use anymore. And if your "free trial" has turned into a hefty recurring charge, you'll be able to see that too.

Remember, good reviews don't automatically equal legitimacy. App reviews can be faked and copied. Don't automatically assume that just because an app has thousands of five-star reviews that it's safe. Recently released apps that already have lots of positive reviews should particularly be treated with suspicion. On the flip side, numerous bad reviews and low ratings also should be seen as red flags.

Be skeptical of big claims. Just like when it comes to emails and texts, apps that offer great deals on hot retail items, cheat codes for games or anything else that's in high demand at the moment have the potential to be scams. Buyer beware.

Avoid third-party app stores. The apps in both Apple and Google's stores are vetted by those companies before they're allowed in. Apps downloaded from elsewhere might not be. They could easily be carrying malware or looking to rip you off. Avoid them.
